Company G of the 116th RCT landed east of Dog Red instead of the planned sector of Dog White. For them this was a fortunate turn of events, as many of them were able to reach the seawall due to the cover provided by the smoke from grass fires. Nevertheless, the unit found itself well off their mark and temporarily paralyzed by indecision.

Other boat sections of Company G encountered more accurate enemy fire at Easy Green, with one team losing 14 men before they reached the seawall. Later in the morning, the entire company shifted westward, but took more losses from this than they had on the beach.

Elements of Company C, 2nd Ranger Battalion landed in Charlie sector as planned. The unit received intense fire from strongpoints directly to its front, and lost half its men before the survivors reached the seawall.

Surviving Rangers, along with one boat team from A/116, scaled the cliffs west of Wn 73 and eventually took out the entire position (Scenario 1).

Tanks from Company A, 743rd Tank Battalion landed on Dog Red and engaged bunkers at the Les Moulins draw with little success. A group of tanks later moved westward, along the beach, heading for the Vierville draw, but were held there until the anti-tank wall was cleared later in the day.

C Company tanks headed for the Vierville draw to assist in the opening of that position.

Tanks from Company C, 743rd Tank Battalion landed on Dog White as planned but the infantry support from Company G, 116th Infantry failed to materialize. Company G/116 drifted to the east, landing on Easy Green, part of the 16th Regimental Combat Team sector.

Major Dallas and the Command Group was to head towards shore in four boats, launched from the Princess Maude. Nine miles out, one of the boats foundered, and all its equipment was lost.

After landing, Dallas noted 25-30 Rangers along the cliffs to his right. He gathered these men with those of his unit and together they assaulted the 'fortified house' to the right of the Vierville draw.

Battalion Headquarters and Headquarters Company came in on Dog Red at 0700. When the ramps went down, fire was so heavy that many men took refuge behind some tanks at the water's edge, only to find them favorite targets for artillery fire. Maj. Sidney V. Bingham, Jr., Battalion Commander, was among the first to reach the shingle, where he set to work

One of the spectacular disasters of the day was suffered by LCI 91, approaching Dog White about 0740 and carrying the alternate headquarters of the 116th RCT. Handled by a veteran crew with experience at Sicily and Salerno, the LCI was struck by artillery fire as it made a first attempt to get through the obstacles. Backing out, the craft came in again for a second try. Element "C" was barely showing above the rising tide, and the LCI could not get past. The ramps were dropped in six feet of water. As some officers led the way off, an artillery shell (or rocket) hit the crowded forward deck and sent up a sheet of flame. Clothes burning, men jumped or fell off into the sea and tried to swim in under continued artillery fire. It is estimated that no personnel escaped from No. 1 compartment of the craft out of the 25 carried there. A few minutes later LCI 92 came into the same sector and suffered almost the same fate, an underwater explosion setting off the fuel tanks. The two craft burned for hours. Much of the artillery fire at this end of the beach was coming from the enemy gun positions toward Pointe et Raz de la Percée. The tanks had been given those flank positions as a priority target, but they found themselves fully occupied by enemy strongpoints in front of the landings.
